The Ostatki Tradition

The Last days of Carnival are called "OSTATKI" in Poland. It is a time of fun and frivolity, providing Poles with the last chance to dance, enjoy meat, pastries and other rich foods and alcoholic beverages before the beginning of Lent. This year Ostatki will be celebrated on Saturday, February 21.

Polish Vodka

Vodka originated in Poland in the early Middle Ages, and it has had a long and distinguished history as Poland's national drink. The word "vodka" or "wodka" is the Polish diminutive for "water" and was originally used for medicinal purpose, such as tonics and various remedies. It was also called "gorzalka", indicating its strength, a term used even today. Flavored vodkas were produced by infusing the spirit with aromatic herbs or extracts and were also utilized in perfumes. From the sixteenth century to the end of the eighteenth, vodka distilling became a significant Polish national industry. In 1572, the privilege to distill vodka was given to the aristocracy, whereupon most Polish manor houses set up their own still to distill the beverage according to their secret recipes. Monasteries also were the center of production. Eventually vodka production spread to the cities and was known in Cracow as early as 1550, from where vodka was exported as far as Silesia. By 1580, the city of Poznan became the country's most important center of production, with over 49 distilleries producing not only vodka but other liqueurs and mead.

Soon the Polish vodka gained a significant international prestige that continues to this day. In Poland, vodka is most often accompanied by "zakaski", appetizers of wide variety, made from numerous traditional ingredients. In recent years, an impressive number of outstanding vodkas has been produced by various Polish distilleries, many using ancient recipes and time-honored production processes. Some of these vodkas are made from potatoes, while the majority are made from grain, particularly Polish rye, which lends its distinctly, slightly sweet aroma and gentle flavor.

Thanks to the Polish traditional high standards for quality, many of these vodkas have gained great international distinction for their purity, taste and time-honored distillation processes.
